COPPER IN JANUARY 2014

Average daily mine production of recoverable copper increased slightly in January from that in December, but was 5% higher than that of January 2013. The U.S. average daily smelter production was essentially unchanged and electrolytic refinery production decreased by 4% compared with production in December. Smelter and electrolytic refinery production for January were 42% and 8% higher, respectively, than in January 2013. Total refined copper stocks at the end of January were 7% less than those at the end of December and 8% less than those at the end of January 2013.

The U.S. producers cathode and the Comex first position copper prices were essentially unchanged in January compared with December 2013 prices. The London Metal Exchange price increased slightly. Platts Metals Daily discontinued publication of the U.S. MW Producer Cathode price in 2014. Therefore, beginning in January 2014, the U.S. producer cathode price in tables 1 and 11 will be represented by the sum of the Comex High Grade First Position price and the NY Dealer Premium Cathodes (the typical premium above the Comex High Grade First Position price being charged by New York metal merchants). In 2013, a comparison of these two price methodologies showed an average monthly price difference of less than one cent per pound.
